REPORT NO.

25X1X

1. The Frolovo (43°38' N/49°46' N) improvised airfield, Stalingrad Oblast, is about two km east of the railroad station. There were no buildings, runways or taxiways.
2. Some biplanes and courier planes were at the field. Individual fighters occasionally landed and took off again. There was no night flying.

25X1A [REDACTED] comment. First postwar report on the Frolovo airfield. The field apparently served as an improvised airfield after the war and during the war, although only occasional landings were observed between October 1944 and October 1946.

Many reports on the north and Transcaucasus area indicate that the Soviets have improved former improvised airfields since about 1948, using them as operational bases for fighter defense units. New emergency airfields have been constructed.
